In the human body, a part of the neurological system called the limbic system is responsible for releasing and expressing emotions. In fact, the area of the brain that is active when we are anxious is the same area used when we are grateful. Thus, if we replace worry and anxiety with gratitude, our bodies benefit in many ways. Mentally, it helps us refocus on what we have instead of what we lack. Physiologically, the feel good chemicals dopamine and serotonin are released, and over time, our bodies actually become better able to handle negative emotions when they do arise. Finally, on a spiritual level, nothing can compare to the peace and joy that fills us each time we give praise and thanksgiving to our creator.
